At Lisbon—Notes From my Diary Continued.

U. S. SHIP ATLANTA, LISBON, Dec. 28, 1889.—We are at anchor in the Tagus river.
I did not go ashore with my messmates last Sunday, but they say the city seemed to be as much alive as on any other day, the stores being open, theatres going, etc.

On Christmas day many of the ships in the harbor were decorated and there was a good deal of ringing of bells and chimes wafted to us from ashore. We had a good dinner early, then went ashore for about two hours.

On landing the first thing that struck me as peculiar was the very crowded appearance of the town. Houses are jammed against and seemingly piled upon each other, the house being raised above the one just in front of you. This is caused by the city being built on sides of hills. There is a sea wall extending along the water front for some distance, and the wharves and landings are miserable.

There are a great number of small, lateenrigged sail boats around the docks painted in the most fantastic fashion, the favorite color being pale green with some bright blue around the bows, with touches of bright yellow.

Nearly opposite the landing is a broad stairway of stone and marble, having wings leading from opposite ends of the street.
These turn and cross each other once or twice, finally uniting at the top and forming merely the entrance to a small, narrow street.

Lisbon seems to be made of hills. At many places you come across these broad flights of stone steps, merely leading from one street into another above; in other places there are steep graded roads, looking rather dangerous for carriages, but I saw several go down them at a rapid gait. The streets are literally infested with soldiers in every imaginable uniform and condition, many wearing blue and white, the national colors.

The pavements here are made of small pieces of stone from an inch and a half to two inches square, very irregular, and matted down smooth with clay. It makes a firm and good side walk when carefully done. There is one square called "Rolling-motion Square" by Americans where the figures are regular curves like waves, and looking at it, the ground has a very wavy, unsettled appearance.

The houses are built of considerable height, and very much alike. On one side the street will be unbroken for many blocks while on the other side little cross streets cut in frequently. The fronts of the houses look very flat, but many are gayly ornamented, some covered with tiles, others painted. The roofs are mostly made of clay pipe in half cylinder, laid first curved side up, then down and over-lapping.

We turned into the avenue where every one goes to walk, ride, or drive. This is a very broad street with three road-ways with parks laid out between them. The streets were crowded with people, it being a holiday.
We saw many stylish turnouts on the road with footmen, etc., in livery.

The eastern part of the town is the oldest and was not destroyed as was the western part by the great earthquake of November 1st, 1755 in which about 60,000 people were killed. Up the avenue to the left is a high hill and in one of the cross streets going over this hill is a track on which there are two coaches connected by a cable; one coach being filled with water, in going down hauls the other up, then vice versa. At one point on the avenue was a small pavilion where the King is said to show himself to the people on the day of the coronation—Saturday is the day set for this—King Ladovick I having died a short time ago. We returned in good time at the landing rather tired, but thinking there was after all a good deal to see in Lisbon.

H. a. me. and myself went ashore at 2 p. m. next day to go horseback riding.
We went to the Hotel Central to find some one who could speak English. The clerk gave us directions to find the stables, but the stableman could not speak English or French however we managed to make him understand what we wanted. We had to pay 6000 reis for the two horses, rather than the looking ones, but making a respectable appearance. We rode up the street in the direction of the Palace of Necessidades and walked our horses slowly down a street which seemed impracticable for carriage driving, but yet a carriage was going down full tilt, the driver lashing his horses to keep them going.
After wandering along these streets for some time we met the Admiral and some other officers returning in carriages from an official call on the King. We found it too late to go on, so turned back until we reached Black Horse Square, in which is an equestrian statue. A street opens into this square through a magnificent arch, sculptured all over in white marble. This square is where some Duke with 40 men attacked a large body of insurgents and routed them completely. We rode on up town passing through a street so narrow one man on horseback can scarcely pass between the cars and curbs; and the pavements are not more than three feet wide. After riding up and down the street several times, we found the stable and dismounted. We hurried to the boat and went back to the ship.

At 1 p. m. yesterday Ensign H. came around with the steam launch and picked us up from the different ships, to play a foot ball game which had been arranged with some Englishmen who live at Carcarvelles, near the mouth of the river. When we landed at the dock, we were met by some Englishmen with open carriages, which we entered and were driven to a railway station. The train soon came in drawn by a small engine, and with ugly box-like cars about one third the length of the ones in America. At last we started, but the train stopped every four minutes, and after about 25 minutes ride we arrived at Carcarvelles.
We were a rather tough looking set, some of us in navy uniform trousers, flannel shirts and tennis caps, others in citizen's grey trousers, white or colored flannel shirts and tennis caps of varied hues. The English team had on regular uniforms of white, with drab stockings and caps. They requested us to go over on the steps, and both teams formed a group and we had our pictures taken. As the men all looked like athletes in good training we expected to be badly beaten, as none of us had taken any exercise for months. Since we only had ten men they agreed to play us with ten and also agreed to play half the time by our rules and half by theirs.

We started out by our rules and quickly rushed down to their goal and soon made a touch down. The score was 16 to 0 in our favor at the end of the first half of 20 minutes. We handled them with ease though they were of equal weight. After resting ten minutes, during which they showed us how their game was played, we lined up.
They quickly rushed the ball to within three feet of our goal line; then we began to work and rushed it back, making a touch down and kicking a goal, scoring six points. We played 25 minutes this half and gave them one more chance after that, but they could make nothing. So the game ended 22 to 0 in our favor. At the close of the game we gave the other side three cheers, which they returned. We went up and shifted again, expecting to leave, but they had prepared a dinner for us and arranged for a "buz" to come for us, so we stayed. The table was nicely set and the cakes decorated with flags, the American being on top. After dinner several of the Englishmen played on the piano and all sang.

About 9:20 p. m. we told them good bye and crowded into the "huz," which had come for us. Beside ourselves there were some Portuguese and one or two Englishmen.
We had to crowd, some sitting in the laps of others. After much cheering, handbaking, etc., the driver yelling in Portuguese and cracking his whip we started in good style, and after many mishaps finally brought up safely at the landing about 11:30 p. m. Our boat was just coming in. We got aboard and arrived rather tired but much elated over our victory. R.
